It is doubly memorable to the writer as it was at this sanguinary en gagement that he was captured by e enemy and taken to the town of Murfreesboro in advance of Rosencrans, who was then in command of the army. The battle was fought three miles from the town on a com-paratively level field, interspersed with upheavals of stone overgrown with cedar of dense growth. With the exception of old Fort Rosecrans near the river, but few traces are left to indicate the ravages of war. The stay was made pleasant by an acquaintance formed thirteen years ago in a venture made to establish a newspaper there. The change in the sentiment and feelings of the people were quite marked. Then it was all bitterness. Thirteen years seemed to have wiped out all asperities and the greetings were warm and cordial. The ex-Confederate element which is as strong here as anywhere in Tennessee, has turned its back on the past and it now looks forward with great hope for the future.
